BAM!

26 INCHES FROM DEATH

BULLETS whizzed by Herb Greeman's head and he could hear the frightful chorus of the machine guns that sounded like corn popping on a hot skillet. White dust filled the early dawn. A land mine belched up mud and water and shredded shrubbery less than twenty feet in front of him.

But Herb pressed closer to the ground and wriggled slowly forward, his dungarees scratching and plowing a furrow in the slimy mud. His hands were burned and scratched from the long crawl across the littered ground. Through sand, mud, rocks, rubble and barbed wire he had wormed his way with dozens of machine guns spitting at him from the dim distance and Sergeant Welsh bellowing at him every time he stopped from utter exhaustion. Other soldiers labored and grunted in the hard going to his right and left and behind him.

The sergeant bellowed now: "Come on, Greeman! This ain't no wiener roast. This is war! Get going!"

Herb dug his hands into the earth and squirmed forward through the slimy mud. A sharp stick gouged his cheek wickedly as he slipped through a puddle of muddy water on his stomach. And then he stopped. He lay as still as if frozen. His muscles wouldn't react.

Sergeant Welsh, veteran of hundreds of such trips under fire, was crawling up beside him, right through the mud puddle. He growled churlishly, "Come on, Greeman; we haven't got all day."

Herb pointed ahead of him. The sergeant's eyes followed his, fascinated. Then his weather-beaten face paled under the grime and dirt and stark terror was mirrored in his eyes. In the eyes that belonged to the man whose job it was to teach other men to be brave, terror was evident.

Because, less than three feet in front of their clutching, grabbing fingers, hissing and rattling with pure wickedness, was a four-foot rattle-snake. The beady eyes glistened. The forked tongue darted in and out of underslung jaws.

WELSH pleaded. He was no longer tough. He had not known fear before. He knew it now. He knew that different men could be afraid of different things. He bleated at Herb, who was closest to the reptilian menace: "Do something! And do it quick! We can't get up or those machine guns will mow us down."

Herb's mind raced. "Blow your whistle, sergeant."

"I can't. I lost the whistle. The lanyard broke on a log fifty feet back."

Herb watched the menacing snake, fascinated by its glare of venomous hate. "If I only had a gun—"

Then the snake moved. Glided forward silently for a foot. Coiled once more, hissing vengefully. Watching that deadly reptile, events of the last ten minutes raced through Herb's mind.

* * * * *

HE HAD fastened his dungarees with trembling fingers as his eyes strained into the dim darkness of the early dawn. A thousand yards away he could see dimly, through the foggy haze that clung to the Florida bush country, the long row of machine guns lined up at the far end of the infiltration course; the course that was to teach them attack under actual war conditions.

Behind him was the solid earth of a tree-covered knoll that would presently crumble and tremble under the impact of thousands and thousands of machine gun bullets. And Herb Greeman shuddered shamefully as he contemplated the frightfulness and horribleness of the next half hour. He was afraid.

Would he turn yellow? Would his brain revolt at the silliness of crawling in the face of spitting machine guns that would pour a sheet of live ammunition just twenty-six inches above the refuse-littered and obstacle-covered course? Would he be able to take it like a man? Or would he go to pieces when this almost wierd training for war got under way? Would he scream with fright? Would his brain and his heart give way to frenzied terror? Would he jump up—crazed with the din and the fright of this commando training—only to be mowed down by machine gun bullets rained at him by his own comrades just a thousand yards away?

He had no more time to think. Action was coming up. Sergeant Welsh, grizzled and weather-beaten, fingered a whistle hanging on a lanyard. His tough, salty eyes roved over the long line of soldiers that was stretched down the long length of the tree-covered knoll. His voice barked out his last-minute instructions.

"This is your final test. The slackers, the shirkers and the men in this group who lack fortitude will not complete this course. We want to find the weaklings now—before it is too late." His eyes moved along the line and focused on the frightened youngster. "What's the matter with you? Paralyzed?"

Herb laughed and answered, unashamed, "I'm scared."

The sergeant talked on, his voice crisp and brutal: "Under simulated conditions of actual warfare, our task is to crawl a thousand yards across this course under a rain of live ammunition. Land mines will go off in your faces. Airplanes will drop small bags of flour to imitate bombing and strafing from the air. You'll have to crawl through sand and mud and rocks and barbed wire."

He toyed with his whistle. "Keep close to the ground and you won't get hit. Remember, just 26 inches above the ground there is a layer of live machine gun fire. 26 inches gives you just room enough to keep from being hit—if you stay low!

"If you get scared—and haven't the nerve to finish the course—just lie atill until you hear my whistle. That'll be the signal for the machine guns to cease firing." His eyes seemed almost to belch fire. "The men who fail this course can join the finance department—or go to the cook tent. The ones who pass—will get a real test in a real war—soon."

He raised his whistle, tentatively. "Ten seconds after I blow this whistle you better be flat—or those machina guns will cut you in half."

* * * * *

AFTER that raced through his mind, Herb felt better. He was not a coward. He was simply afraid of something that he had not yet experienced. Now he was afraid no longer. . . . Of bullets and such. The sergeant had never been afraid of bullets. But he was afraid of this poisonous reptile that barred their path. That did not make a coward of the sergeant. He was afraid of something about which he knew nothing, the same as Herb had been afraid of live bullets raining over him, just 26 inches above the ground.

With every muscle taut and tense and every emotion tuned to fever pitch, Herb whispered to the sergeant, "Try to reach back of you and pick that stick out of that mud puddle. Pass it up to me. Carefully, or the rattler will strike."

In a brief, thrill-packed moment, the sergeant had obeyed. Herb had the stick. The sergeant watched him fearfully, fascinated. Herb moved the stout stick forward slowly, toward the snake.

Quicker than light, the coiled snake struck. Its wicked head shot forward vengefully. And in the same instant Herb jerked the stick forward and clamped it down firmly behind the snake's head. The rattler squirmed and threshed about violently, but the stick behind its head held the reptile helpless.

With bullets screaming over his head, Herb squirmed forward inch by inch, maintaining the firm pressure on the snake's head. Then he grasped the reptile firmly behind the head with his left hand and released the pressure on the stick. The rattler coiled viciously around his left forearm but Herb had his venomous head secure in a firm grip.

With bullets screaming over their heads and land mines exploding in the near foreground and sacks of flour dropping like puff-balls around them from the skies, mocking death from every direction, Herb squirmed and crawled and slid the tedious way to the far end of the course—that threshing, venomous, deadly rattlesnake gripped tight in his left hand. Herb and the sergeant were the first to arrive at the ead of the course.

Herb got to his feet behind the serried row of machine guns, the snake still coiling and hissing around his left arm. He freed the coils and carefully tossed the rattler to the ground. Machine gun bullets finishad off the snake with their stuttering clamor of death.

Sergeant Welsh was oddly docile, "Gree-man, I apologize. I honestly thought that you were yellow, but now I owe you my life. I've been an egotistical genius—thinking that it took courage for me to teach rookies to crawl along the ground with a curtain of sure death just 26 inches above the ground. I thought 26 inches from death was close. But you ran this course with a live rattlesnake! You had certain death right in your hand."

Herb grinned. "All men are afraid of something. Usually the thing about which they know nothing, or which they have never experieaced. You're not afraid of crawling this course. I was—until I'd done it. You were afraid of that rattlesnake—because you know nothing about snakes. I wasn't. My father was the keeper of the Brookfield Snake House. I played with snakes like other kids play with toy soldiers."

THAT'S NOT YOUR HEADACHE, MICHAEL ANGELO! HURRY UP-- IT'S STARTING TO RAIN!

THE INTRUDERS PUSH INTO TRENTON'S STUDIO --

HOLY SMOKES, RAINBOWS!! MILLIONS OF THEM!

I PAINT NOTHING ELSE!

THAT'S CRAZY! THERE AIN'T ANYTHING TO RAINBOWS!

ON THE CONTRARY, MY RUDE FRIEND-- THEY ARE MY LIFE'S WORK AND I'VE MADE A COMPREHENSIVE STUDY OF THEM!

YOU SEE, ACTUALLY RAINBOWS ARE AN ACCUMULATION OF REFLECTED SUNLIGHT ON DROPS OF RAIN -- THE GEOMETRIC THEORY CONSIDERS...

HUH?

POT OF GOLD

SMART GUY-- WHO DO YOU THINK YOU'RE RIDIN' ? SHUT UP !

HERE'S THE WAY I PAINT RAINBOWS, OR ANYTHIN' ELSE !

STOP -- MY PAINTING!

YOU DARE TO RUIN MY WORK-- YOU-- YOU STUPID FOOL !

AW, RELAX-- YOU'VE GOT PLENTY MORE!

HOW COULD YOU KNOW WHAT ART IS-- WHAT IT MEANS! ALL YOU KNOW IS THIS!!

BUT COE'S HENCHMAN COMES UP BEHIND THE ANGRY ARTIST!

DON'T KILL HIM YET-- I'M MAKE HIM EAT PAINT FOR THAT!

COE CARRIES OUT HIS WILD THREAT--

C'MON, WISE GUY-- EAT IT UP! EAT!!

UGH-- NO! STOP! AGHRR!

IT'S STOPPED RAINING, BOSS-- LET'S GET THAT RANSON NOTE ON IT'S WAY! FORGET THAT SCREWBALL!

HUH-- DIS GUY'S NO ARTIST-- HE'S OUT COLD FROM EATIN' A LITTLE PAINT!

MEANWHILE, ON THE ROAD --

GUESS THIS IS THE END OF THE TRAIL, ED!

YEAH--THAT RAIN WASHED AWAY THE TIRE TRACKS OF COE'S CAR!

LOOK, ED -- A RAINBOW! PRETTY, ISN'T IT?

YEAH -- WELL, WE'D BETTER GET BACK AND REPORT! C'MON-- WE CAN TURN AROUND AT THAT BARN!

THEN, WHEN THE COPS PULL INTO TRENTON'S DRIVEWAY...

JIM! LOOK! THAT'S THE KIDNAP CAR! HOLY SMOKE-- COE'S IN THAT BARN!

THE KIDNAPPERS ARE CAUGHT--WHILE THEY ARE WRITING THE RANSOM NOTE.

WHA --HEY! THE COPS!

OKAY, BOYS--JUST DON'T MOVE! ED, UNTIE HUNT OVER THERE!

HUHP!

LATER-- IT WAS FUNNY--I WAS JUST LOOKIN' AT THE RAINBOW AND NOTICED THIS BARN AT THE END OF IT-- IT LOOKED LIKE A GOOD PLACE TO TURN AROUND! THEN...

HMM-- YOU MEAN A RAINBOW LED YOU HERE?

RATHER HUMOROUS, EH, MR. HUNT?

MR. TRENTON--ASIDE FROM A FEELING OF GRATITUDE, I APPRECIATE YOUR CANVASSES AS WORKS OF ART! IF POSSIBLE, I WOULD LIKE TO PURCHASE EVERY ONE OF THEM FOR MY COLLECTION!

WHY--

OF COURSE! --BUT, HOW STRANGE... YOU AND I NEEDED CRIME, MR. HUNT, TO PROVE THAT THERE IS A POT OF GOLD AT THE END OF OUR RAINBOWS!
